Meet the Football playing robot

Move over Messi - engineers in California, USA, have created a full sized humanoid robot that can play football. The robot, named ARTEMIS, is one of only three robots in the world that can run. Engineers are so confident in the robot's ability that they have signed it up for this year's Robocup - an international football competition just for robots!

Scientists reveal why we love a selfie

Selfies have long been associated with vanity, but now scientists in the US say that the reason most of us love a good selfie is much deeper. After studying over 2,000 people, researchers found that physically putting ourselves in a picture helps an event to become more meaningful and helps us to remember and reconnect to the experience.

Man completes three peak challenge with fridge on his back

A man from Stafford, England has completed the three peak challenge with a fridge strapped to his back. Michael Copeland scaled the three highest mountains in England, Scotland and Wales in just under 24 hours to raise money for charity. The fridge illustrates the burden of carrying mental health issues around.

Zero-gravity gigs get lift off

We could soon be raving like we're in space, according to Florida-based company Zero-G, which predicts that zero-gravity music gigs could be happening by the end of the year. They are currently appealing for artists to put themselves forward. However, a ticket could set you back around $9000 (around £7,100), ouch!

Teens reveal what they want in a job

Teens want a job that will make them happy over money, new research shows. (However, money does come a close second!) A survey of 2,000 teens aged 13-18 said they'd also like to be their own boss and work in a job that makes a positive difference to the world. 75% of teens said that their parents are the most influential people in their lives and career aspirations.
